

ANNOUNCING:
A SERIES OF CONFERENCE CALLS ON
THE SOCIAL-EMOTIONAL DEVELOPMENT
OF YOUNG CHILDREN

The Georgetown University Center for Child and Human Development, with support from the Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation, is launching a series of 10 conference calls focusing on the social-emotional development of young children (birth through five years old). The purpose of these calls is to increase the capacity of a broad array of stakeholders involved in the care of young children to promote healthy development, identify children at risk for poor outcomes and intervene effectively with children needing specialized attention. The target audience for these calls includes early care and education providers, agency administrators, technical assistance providers and others working with young children and their families.

THESE CALLS WILL TAKE PLACE FROM 1:00-2:30 pm (EST)
ON THE LAST WEDNESDAY OF EVERY MONTH, BEGINNING JULY 30TH, 2003.

TOPICS WILL INCLUDE:

- Early brain research
- Risk and resilience
- Curricula for promoting healthy social-emotional development
- Infusing social-emotional development into early childhood settings
- Screening and assessment
- Impact of maternal depression on young children
- Children and trauma
- Relationship-based intervention approaches
- And more!

National experts will serve as presenters, as will practitioners who are involved in promising practices. Presentations will highlight effective strategies for delivering family-driven, culturally appropriate services in community-based settings.

Up to 200 individuals per call will be able to participate on a first-come-first serve basis. Handouts, including Powerpoint presentations, will be provided to people who register for the calls.

****Please send an email to mk73@georgetown.edu (MelKisha Knight) if you want to be added to the list for the first call.

Materials will be emailed to you. More information to come!
